

A Spatial Approach To Regionalism In The Global Economy

Editors' Introduction: Reading the Intellectual History of Regionalism

1. Raison d'être of this Four Volume Set

This unique four-volume set captures and organizes more than 60 years of academic research on regional integration and regionalism. The general ambition is to contribute to the consolidation of a deeply fragmented field of study, still in search of its own intellectual history.

While there is a strong tendency in both policy and academia to acknowledge the importance of regions and regionalism, the approach of different academic specializations varies considerably, and regionalism means different things to different people in different contexts. In principle such diversity could be productive and could indicate increasing maturity of the field of study. Even if we may speak of an emerging academic community of regionalism, the prevailing fragmentation is a sign of weakness more than strength. The problem is a general lack of dialogue among academic disciplines, regional specializations (e.g. European integration, Latin American, Asian, and African regionalism), as well as theoretical traditions and approaches (e.g. rationalism, institutionalism, constructivism, critical and postmodern approaches). There is also thematic fragmentation in the sense that various forms of regionalism, such as economic, security, and environmental regionalism, are only rarely related to one another. These divisions undermine further generation of cumulative knowledge as well as theoretical and methodological developments. Indeed, the divisions and lack of dialogue lead to unproductive contestations, among both academics and policy-makers, about the meaning of regionalism, its causes and effects, how it should be studied, what to compare and how, and not least, what are the costs and benefits of regionalism and regional integration.
